We also show you how to create your own brochures, flyers, posters, booklets, and other materials.

What's New in the?

In the June 2015 issue of Genome Biology and Evolution A. Cunningham-Rundles and R. O'Connor raised a clear question regarding the range of tetrapods in the Paleozoic. They found several groups of tetrapods that they tentatively assigned to at least three different geological periods: 1. Rhinocephalia: basal tetrapods that have rhinosclerotic exoskeletal spines. These are probably Triassic. 2. Mammaliformes (mammals with teats, sensu lato): basal-branch tetrapods with a dorsal fossa that serves as an equivalent to a teat (sensu lato). These are Cretaceous. 3. Dipnomorphi: basal--branch tetrapods that lack such a fossa and have relatively depressed otic notches; both of these are Cretaceous. In any listing of such animals, the assignment of the Rhinocephalia should be a priori, as this is a very strong argument for the end-Permian extinction. A more controversial case is the assignment of the Dipnomorphi to the Cretaceous, as by that time there were a number of amniotic taxa. In their key, Cunningham-Rundles and O'Connor's question of whether the Dipnomorphi or Rhinocephalia are the most basal tetrapods remains unanswered. 55 Ill.
